The narrator uses food as a metaphor for cultural identity. How effective is this metaphor? What kinds of foods does the narrator describe to define who she and her family are? What kinds of foods does she describe to define who she wishes to be? Can any person be defined by what they eat and what they long to eat? How much can a person's diet reveal about who they are?

Rosa, the narrator's stepmother, teaches her stepchildren to embrace their Vietnamese heritage and tries to integrate herself into the local Vietnamese community, which often emphasizes the cultural differences between Rosa and her adopted family. Why does Rosa try so hard to embrace Vietnamese culture? Was her method the best way to unify a mixed- culture family?

On the few occasions in which the narrator is finally allowed to indulge in the foods she's idealized-Kraft Macaroni and Cheese after she has an argument with Rosa, a pork-chop dinner at her friend Holly's house- she finds herself disappointed by their flavors. How is this mirrored in the accompanying personal experiences?

The music references in the book are almost as rich and evocative as the food imagery. Is music more or less personal than food? Given that music is purely sensory pleasure while food is a necessity that can also be a sensory pleasure, what do you make of their impacts on culture? Which has had more of an impact in your own life?

How has the immigrant's status changed since Nguyen's family came to America? What was unique about the immigration situation for Vietnamese refugees? Which of the narrator's experiences-harrowing escape, immigrant sponsorship, religious condescension, etc.--could have happened today? Which experiences would be different?

What does the book reveal about ideas on motherhood and matriarchy? Why does Nguyen structure her book so that the revelations about her birth mother are not revealed until "Mooncakes"? How do themes of motherhood in the book reflect tensions between the immigrant and her mother country?
