Generalist Practice is both a process and a method. As a process, it involves a more or less orderly sequence of progressive stages in engaging the client in activities and actions that promote agreed-on goals.

As a method, generalist practice entails the creative use of techniques and knowledge that guide intervention activities designed by the social work practitioner.

Generalist social work practice, seeks to improve, ...

The face-to-face relationship between the social worker and the client has maintained its integrity as a fundamental prerequisite for intervention, as has the emphasis on process.

The client's right to self-determination and confidentiality are fundamental practice values in the helping process.
