Double check your memories. Memory can be false, flattering, and defensive. Interview people who were there and crosscheck your details Use all the props available: letters, diaries, obituaries, photos, certificates, newspaper articles, etc. Research your locality, your region, the era, history, etc., to give authenticity and context to your personal story.

Set up a schedule for yourself. Honor your writing time as you would any important appointment. Ask your family and friends for their support in making time for this commitment. Writing regularly is more important than writing for long periods. Be patient and enjoy yourself. Lifewriting can bring you great pleasures.

Start a lifewriting group with friends. For encouragement and support, it's great to share with others. But beware of two opposite but equally discouraging reactions. These are in the vein of; "Isn't that lovely, dear. Everything you do is wonderful!"
