I introduce Jekka McVicar

Jekka explains how gardening has been part of her life since childhood, and how she came to start gardening as a profession

Jekka talks about the way she views the role of soil

I add my thoughts on the importance of the biology of the soil

We discuss people's views towards our ways of thinking back in the 80s

Jekka talks about rewilding – the importance if rewilding with certain plants, and how to let nature rewild by itself

I talk about my concerns about weeds when I first started no dig, and how organic farmers in the 1980s would deal with weeds

Jekka talks about her past difficulties with being classified as an organic grower when growing in pots, and goes on to explain how she continually reuses the same pots for growing and why she sometimes cleans them...

whereas I never do!

Jekka describes how she lost an entire crop of cuttings through using recycled water, and how she now uses mains water to minimise the risk, as well as using biofungus on her raised beds

We discuss the increasing interest in growing your own veg

I talk about my interest in microbes, and their beneficial effect on gut health
 I explain the unexpected reason that I failed an exam in kinesiology
 We talk about the first Glastonbury Festival, which Jekka played
 I talk about when and why I became interested in soil health
 We talk about poisonous pyralid weedkiller... and how growing is a continuous learning process
 Jekka describes the positive outcome from not treating green fly Jekka talks about our different approaches to propagation!
 I give my thoughts on the power of the internet for teaching and cultivating change
 Jekka gives an example that demonstrates the resilience of plants
 I talk about my love for teaching
 We discuss our mutual desire to impart the knowledge we have, and think about our next discussion!
