Webinar: 20 years of the ESS: Democracy and politics - Webinar: 20 years of the ESS: Democracy and politics by European Social Survey 178 views 10 months ago 1 hour, 37 minutes - A European, Social Survey, (ESS) webinar on Wednesday 3 May focused European, attitudes towards democracy and politics,.

Harley Roe (Florida State University) discussed levels of governmental satisfaction amongst respondents who identify as far-right, conservative, liberal, far-left and other political party supporters. There was a specific focus on whether far-right political party supporters are less satisfied than others, both when in opposition and in government, and whether far-right democratic representation erodes support.

Klára Plecítá (Czech Academy of Sciences) presented on levels of satisfaction with the way democracy works amongst respondents who feel that they are discriminated against. The research sought to understand whether those who are discriminated against because of colour/race, nationality, religion, language, ethnicity, age, gender, sexuality, disability or other grounds are less satisfied than other respondents.

Giuseppe Ciccolini (European University Institute) focused on whether support for populist radical right political parties is boosted by respondents who face a loss of economic status. Ciccolini also used Eurostat data to create a positional measure of income to help provide cultural and economic explanations of the reasons some vote for these types of party.

Marta KoBczyDska (Polish Academy of Sciences) introduced research that analysed the effects of political polarisation on citizens' political engagement. It explored whether polarisation has an effect on different forms of political participation and support, and whether the effect varies across societal groups.

Mikkel Haderup Larsen (University of Copenhagen) discussed the effect of democratic representation of radical right-wing political parties on attitudes towards the welfare state. It addresses the right-wing populism literature that suggests radical right parties erode welfare solidarity in European democracies when they pit "the people" against immigrants and ethnic minorities.

A Q&A chaired by ESS deputy director, Dr. Eric Harrison, followed the presentations.
