Feeling Safe

Finding Food

Novelty

Family and Companionship

Acceptance and Approval like all social animals, mice crave acceptance within their family group since banishment from the group usually means certain death to a social animal how long it takes to tame your mouse depends very much on your mouse's individual personality, its early experiences and your experience and skill level with animals some mice are born tame, others are born very timid, mice who were socialized to humans when still very young, will be easier to tame than those with no socialization mouse ownership is more about making your mouse happy and getting your joy from that, than being able to pet it mice are such joyful animals, with them you can create one little space of pure happiness in your home, a world that is simple and right their joy of life is infectious and this is what mouse ownership is all about building a relationship with such a tiny, yet intelligent animal, is a magical experience there is no way to describe the feeling when your mouse makes eye contact with you for the first time, and you feel that current of connection
